The Leica M7, due to its manual focus, is possibly a fraction slower to use than some of the cameras I regularly carry. In many ways though it is obviously a lot less restrictive than them too. It provides a more full sense of control, but thanks to the level of automation it does have, it allows for much of the speed of thinking that I revel in when using a fully automated camera.

Leica M7 review - a near perfect camera (for me)

I had a chance to use the Leica M7 TTL .72 rangefinder film camera together with the Leica 35mm f/2.0 Summicron M Aspherical lens for about a month and shot with this gear in different conditions and shoots. Prior to the M7, I never shot with any Leica gear but heard so much about them from other photographers and industry peers.

Leica M7 Review - Photography Life

Leica continues to make these for a minority of people who prefer small, quiet, simple cameras with superb optics over the convenience and precise composition of SLRs. My M7 and three lenses weigh less than three pounds, total This light weight encourages me to hike farther and get into places Id be too lazy to try with DSLRs.

The M7 is also the first Leica M series to support film DX encoding and exposure compensation using the dial that has been on the back of Leica cameras since the M3. Originally used simply as a reminder of the sensitivity of the film, and then as film speed setting coupled to the light meter starting with the M6 , the dial now controls exposure compensation on the M7.

Leica M7 - Wikipedia

The M7 with Leica Summicron 50mm f/2 or Summicron 35mm f/2 is tiny, inobstrusive, and very quick to focus and shoot. It's an excellent walk-about camera. One of the primary reasons I got the M7 was for its proven toughness in the field. The Summicrons are the highest rated 35mm and 50mm lenses available in the world in both sharpness and resolution.
