Vision occurs when light enters the eye through the pupil. With help from other important structures in the eye, like the iris and cornea, the appropriate amount of light is directed towards the lens. Just like a lens in a camera sends a message to produce a film, the lens in the eye 'refracts' (bends) incoming light onto the retina.

Although the term social-emotional learning didn't exist in the 1960s, Jane Elliott's experiment is a rich example of how to help students understand the experiences and feelings of others. In this article, we'll explore the details and history of the experiment and then discuss how you can bring some of the same principles to your classroom.

Social Emotional Learning Lessons for Jane Elliott ...

The eye itself is a hollow sphere composed of three layers of tissue. The outermost layer is the fibrous tunic, which includes the white sclera and clear cornea. The sclera accounts for five sixths of the surface of the eye, most of which is not visible, though humans are unique compared with many other species in having so much of the "white of the eye" visible (Figure 8.34).
